

Open Day for Archaeology & Biological Anthropology

Prospective students considering studying Archaeology or Biological Anthropology at the University of Cambridge are invited to an Open Day on Thursday 25 February 2016. The day will consist of a brief introduction to both subjects, followed by small-group sessions run by teaching staff from the Divisions of Archaeology and Biological Anthropology, and from the Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology. Students will receive hands-on practicals to discover what working in these fields is really like. The day will end with an informal session to speak with academic staff and current students, and a Q&A session about admissions and how to apply. We will also have a special session covering the study of Assyriology and Egyptology.

This event will have limited spaces, so contact us soon to reserve your place.
